This book presents a comprehensive analysis of the phenomenon of deposits of valuables in the landscapes of ancient Europe. These deposits, which range from hoards of bronze and gold objects to individual pieces of jewelry, have been found in a variety of contexts, including rivers, lakes, bogs, and fields.

The authors of this book argue that these deposits were not simply the result of lost or discarded objects, but rather were deliberate offerings made to the gods or other supernatural beings. They examine the different types of deposits, their contents, and their distribution in Free Download to shed light on the religious beliefs and practices of the ancient Europeans.

This book is a valuable resource for archaeologists, historians, and anthropologists who are interested in the study of ancient European religion. It provides a comprehensive overview of the current state of research on this topic and offers new insights into the beliefs and practices of the ancient Europeans.
