The Army's involvement in Kuwait began with the deployment of the 82nd Airborne Division to Saudi Arabia in August 1990. The 82nd was quickly followed by other Army units, and by the end of the year, over 500,000 US troops were deployed to the region. The Army's mission in Kuwait was to liberate the country from Iraqi occupation and to restore the Kuwaiti government. The Army also played a key role in providing humanitarian assistance to the Kuwaiti people and in rebuilding the country's infrastructure.

The Army's efforts in Kuwait were successful in achieving their objectives. The Iraqi army was defeated and expelled from Kuwait, and the Kuwaiti government was restored. The Army also provided much-needed humanitarian assistance to the Kuwaiti people and helped to rebuild the country's infrastructure. The Army's work in Kuwait was a major success story, and it is a testament to the skill and dedication of the American soldier.

The Army's experience in Kuwait provides valuable lessons for future post-conflict reconstruction efforts. The Army's success in Kuwait was due to a number of factors, including its ability to work closely with other US government agencies and international partners, its ability to adapt to changing circumstances, and its commitment to providing humanitarian assistance to the local population. The Army's experience in Kuwait is a model for future post-conflict reconstruction efforts, and it is a testament to the Army's ability to adapt and to succeed in complex and challenging environments.

The Army and the Reconstruction of Kuwait is a comprehensive and engaging account of the US Army's role in the liberation and reconstruction of Kuwait following the Iraqi invasion in 1990. This book offers a unique perspective on the challenges and triumphs of post-conflict nation-building, making it an essential read for anyone interested in military history, international relations, or the Middle East.
